Enjoy over three hours of live recorded multi-track audio performances.

Watch the techniques demonstrated in over 50 full-motion videos.

Songs can be displayed in either music notation or tablature (shown here).

Song looping lets you highlight and repeat any section of music you wish to practice.

Instructor advice is only a click away.

Slow the music down with variable-speed MIDI tracks.

Music tracking highlights notes or chords as they are played.

The screenshot shows a digital music player interface for the song "House of the Rising Sun (1 of 2)". The interface is framed in a wood-grain border. At the top left, the number "114" is displayed. The title "House of the Rising Sun (1 of 2)" is centered at the top. Below the title, it says "Traditional Folk Song". On the left side, there are several control buttons: a play/pause button, a "Slow" button, a "Full" button, a "MIDI" button, and a "Fast" button. At the bottom left, there is a speaker icon with a lightning bolt, representing instructor advice. The main area displays musical notation on a staff with a treble clef and a key signature of one flat. The lyrics are written below the staff. A green box highlights a section of the music, and a red vertical line indicates the current playback position. At the bottom right, there is a progress bar and a "Song continues on next screen." message. The text "RH Pattern: i-f-m-r-m-i" is visible in the top right corner of the interface.

Avernum 5 is a beautifully crafted party based old school RPG with a absolutely MASSIVE world. This game has kept me busier and more interested than many of todays modern RPGs.

I honestly prefer this to games like Skyrim - but that's a matter of taste.

If you're looking to experience the old school RPG experience, and want a game so massive you could sink a hundred hours into, this is your game.. unless you have a steering wheel and gas and brake this game is definitely no worth getting. Simply fantastic, many an hour spent practicing take offs go arrounds and landings, lots of eye candy and highly recomended..

UPDATE:

Following my review, the developer and I had a long chat about various aspects of the game and other subjects, including his next project, which he hopes will greatly improve upon the experience here.

I learned that he intended for a community to form around this game and work together to figure out certain unexplained mechanics and locate the secrets, not for each player to try to do it all himself. Indeed, obtaining all the secrets requires several types of unconventional thinking that I do not regularly employ because other games do not expect it of me, but which a group would be much more likely to suggest. Of course, one cannot simply expect his game to be successful enough to generate that sort of interest and cooperation, but knowing the intention here does soften my opinion of the game a bit.

Additionally, the developer seems quite aware of the game's flaws and is open to substantive criticism and suggestions, so I am optimistic about his future work.

However, the following review does still stand.

ORIGINAL REVIEW:

A game that does not respect my time is a game that I cannot recommend.

The mediocre main story is only around 40 minutes long, so the bulk of the game involves hunting down the various secrets and alternate endings. This is where things break down.

Perhaps the biggest problem with the secret hunting is that literally half of the levels take place on the same blocky, mostly empty map, with only minor differences among the chapters. I spent a long time running along identical rooftops and jumping over identical fences down similar alleyways (there is some variation to interiors, but secrets are usually outside), totally unsure if I was heading toward a dead end, an inescapable area, or one of the secrets. Each new chapter on the map also involved going back to the same places just to check if new secrets had appeared, which was sometimes the case.

Furthermore, since not every secret is meaningful or tied to an achievement, discovering something did not necessarily feel rewarding. Even when it did, it was minor: a few lines of dialogue adding little to the story or joke memes. I'm not sure why the developers put such an emphasis on this part of the game if they weren't going to do anything significant with it.

Traversal of a bland, empty world for meaningless rewards would be bad enough in any case, but there are also no in-game hints or nudges, no guide outside of the game, no map. The player is utterly directionless.

As for the game in general, various other design decisions work together to frustrate:

*Checkpoints are granted sequentially: they exist in particular locations in the level and are overridden and "deleted" upon reaching the next one. If the player has reached the end of a map and wants to return to earlier parts to explore, this means that every death will spawn him at the end of the map rather than at a checkpoint closest to the location of his death or at the last safe platform before that death.

*Some secrets/achievements require carrying an item across the map, but there is no inventory system. The item literally has to be carried by hand and thrown over obstacles, since the player can't climb while holding an item. Of course, if the item falls into a pit, it doesn't respawn near the player or on the ground nearby. No, it respawns all the way back at its original location -- if you remember where that was. Enjoy either backtracking to that location or dying to respawn at a distant checkpoint, only to have to attempt to take the item back to the goal -- if you can find it and recognize it as such.

*Accessing secrets often requires finding and carrying boxes or trash cans to walls to build towers to ascend. This can be tedious enough on its own, but these objects are also subject to physics, so placing them on top of each other and jumping on them without shifting them around can be a chore. Running with them in hand is also a visual mess.

*The wall jump mechanic is only granted after completing a secret level, which is only accessible after completing the game. It is also the worst implementation of such a mechanic that I have ever encountered. I have to wonder why this essential parkour element was left out of the main game.

*Replaying chapters leads to unskippable, though generally brief, cutscenes and dialogue.

*The final level forces the player into extremely slow and lurching movement for story reasons, which is fine except for the fact that exploring the level (once again, wide open and mostly empty) for secrets takes far too much time accordingly. I felt like my time wasn't being respected in the previous levels, but here I felt like the developers were just being sadistic.

Beyond the flaws in the design, the game suffers in other ways:

*It doesn't explore its platforming to its full potential: there are never any hazards besides pits, platforms don't ever move or do anything interesting, and the difficulty doesn't escalate as the game, short as it is, progresses. The wall jump is barely explored at all simply because it isn't available until after the end of the game. This was a big missed opportunity.

*The story is nothing special, nor could it have been with what little dialogue there was in such a short time.

*The music is nothing special and often seems to disappear. I don't know if this hurts the game, but it certainly doesn't help it.

*I don't have a problem with Minecraft-like visuals, but here they seem very lazy, especially in the exteriors. I already mentioned that this is bad for secret hunting, but it's also just unpleasant to look at identical brick or rooftop textures stretching across the screen with no detail whatsoever.

Don't be fooled by my hours played. I wasted a lot of time and I don't look back on the experience fondly.. Loved this. It's a really fun puzzle/exploration game, more specifically it's basically an escape the room game. The puzzles aren't ever frustrating but definitely not simple either. You're essentially trying to escape from a house as per an unknown person's rules, and you keep discovering/solving puzzles to grant access to new areas in the home which have more puzzles and so forth. I liked how the puzzles were intertwined between the various rooms in the house so there was always a lot of things going on at once so you never got bored/stuck staring at the same puzzle. Graphics/sound were good and user interface was simple without any issues.

The only criticism I have for the game would be:

- Loading a save game would often look like it would crash before working (and did twice)
- User interface for reading notes needed work (no way to scroll through them easily)
- Jumping was awkward and you'd often get stuck in your spot unable to get up
- Built up a mysterious story of why you're there but it didn't go anywhere

Not bad for the price of a dinner at McDonalds. It's not something that's going to keep you coming back for hours, but for 6 bucks its an interesting 45 mintues or so. There is enough content to tinker with and I had a few chuckles. The atmosphere is nice (wish my apartment was that awesome!) and I like that you can mess with just about everything short of the actual walls. I'm also glad that I caught this after the little add on that lets you turn the lights off. I really like the look of the place in the day light from the huge windows. It makes me want to actually crash on one of the couches and grab a book or something. The little vehicle's are fun. The head tracking in the apache was brilliant. I flew the little sopwith out of the apartment and bounced off the roof and I was pretty surprised I didn't run into any invisible walls. It's apperent that there was effort put into making a finite space as interesting as possible.

For some conctructive criticism; I will say that the little RVC vehicle are fun, however, for some reason they made me a little bit queasy (and I've played a few games that are far more intense without having that problem). I'd recommend having a seat while trying to use them. Also the the model for the dancing lady with fruit on her head is VERY narfed. Or at least it was when I found her. Her arms where bent way above the elbow and her hips and legs where doing some strange things. It looked like the animation didn't quite line up with the model.

A suggestion; This app or something similar would be neat to have as a media player option. Like if you could park on the couch and watch Netflix, another media streaming service, or play local content. Imagine that with a multiplayer function too! Sit and watch a movie with a friend or even a group!

Overall, worth what I paid for it and a nice VR demo.

To the folks who where negative about the price; If you can afford a VR head set and the cpu to run it, then you can afford 6 dollars (less then the cost of a movie out of a bargain bin) Someone put effort into this. They deserve to be paid for it.

. Very weird game dont understand the blue monsters but there fun to shoot.

Im more of a duke nukem fan but had to buy serious sam an check it out for myself.

The humor is okay gameplay is good but i relly enjoy the multiplayer the most so it won me over on that will be buying more!!!!!! I don't know why is this game getting hate, this game is acually pretty good.. I was pleasantly surprised by this game; with all the negative reviews, I thought the gameplay would be awful. It's not. It's a Mahjong solitaire game, and apparently some people have no idea what that means. Sometimes, you're going to farckerberg your tiles to where you end with an unsolvable puzzle. Sometimes random generation can do this to you, same as any solitaire game (or so I understand it, because when I couldn't finish a puzzle in this game it's been wholly my fault for not playing different combinations, etc). The nudity title is wholly misleading, because there is no nudity, and having cleared all five stages I can tell you the most revealing outfit is a bikini. This is NOT a game to play if you're looking for nudity; it IS a fun Mahjong solitaire game though. Is anyone else old enough to remember Taipei? It's Taipei with anime girls. After clearing the five stages though it definitely loses appeal; I think a random puzzle shape generator would have increased the replay value for me. All in all, a fun game at a cheap price.

TL;DR: For playing, not for fapping. Occasionally requires mental effort on your part.. Its an ok game. 8.7/10. I had a chance to play the demo of this at ECGC 2017, and was immediately sucked into this sci-fi futurepunk story. The art style for The Mind's Eclipse is a wonderful ink shaded world that appropriately sets the tone for the world. A fantastic visual novel.
